Personally I like this approach because my reason for reading the code is simply to answer the question. If I have to go read a comment, I'll lose focus. The suggested approach is that people should instead click the "post a code review" link at the bottom of the question, and offer a comment in that question. Is this a good idea? A: I'd say the "post a code review" link is how SO did it when it was still a beta site (and I'm pretty sure that's how it was always intended to work, as its primary function was to allow people to test the site). IMO, these are questions on the same site which happen to have code involved in them, so it makes sense to bring them under a single umbrella. It's also a good way to make the questions more familiar to someone familiar with the type of question, as you're forcing them to spend time reading the post before
