A facile crystal growth and device fabrication method to make the center emission wavelength of a vertical-cavity surface-emitting laser (VCSEL) to be green is demonstrated. The energy gap between two grating (1D and 2D) of the VCSEL is increased by adding a spatial separation between two AlAs/GaAs quarter-wave layers, which contributes to the change of the interference reflectance in the VCSEL. By doing this, the light in the cavity is effectively reduced, and a gradual turning point of reflectance at the passband around 550 nm is observed. An emission wavelength of 546.8 nm with a linewidth of less than 1 pm was achieved. The coherence length of the single-mode emission is estimated to be more than 100 microm.
