From my balcony in Bath I have watched three men land and drink tea at Dyke Green in the orbit of Daunton Rugby Club. One was Ian Botham. The second was Danny Cipriani. The third was Richard Halsall and their discourse concerned the going of the game and the fizz of lemonade. The consensus was that it was a sad day for cricket. Also that the game had changed for the worse. On Thursday, Botham's appeal against a third and final count of his fifty not out in the NatWest Series final was dismissed by an independent panel of three umpires. Accordingly, as Botham had no match to play, his call for lbw came in vain. It left a plaque on the archives in Lord's that those white strips on the gate will retain their sanctity. Had he scored fifty not out, he would have been as safe as the Thomas twins at Happy Valley. The public at large, though, came away from yesterday's proceedings believing that, even given the reputed high regard of the players, the game was doomed. Someone once said that sportsmen, unlike politicians or showbiz celebrities, never go voluntarily through the public cleansing process
