That's why you have a 401(k) plan and you're saving money in CDs. Yeah. But the time is coming—or has come—for you to invest in business. This article appeared in the August 2015 issue of BOSS Weekly. Subscribe here. Companies and their products are never as sexy as when they're hot. As they age, companies go through different cycles of glamor, decline and creative destruction. Undervalued companies rarely become hot because people want the hot ones, not the ones that are low-energy and boring, like the old ones. People like to buy hot companies. When they're hot, they are perceived as not yet cool enough to be owned by big institutional investors. That means that hot companies can be undervalued for long periods of time and still continue to rise in value. But we're getting closer to the time when they're going to start becoming hot, because that's when they are no longer considered to be undervalued. Once that starts to happen, institutional investors begin to look at the companies and this puts them into a different category. When they begin to look at a company as being "hot," they begin to make their own views known to the market, and they start to bid up the price of the company. When that happens, there's a certain point at which the company is no longer considered undervalued. That's where we are now with stocks like Facebook, Spotify, and Google, and that is when they begin to become well-known and well-traded. We now have a different type of behavior. In the next 18 months, look for stocks to start becoming more expensive, in order to become more popular. When that happens, there is a point
