Chronic ankle instability (CAI) is a highly prevalent condition that often presents with asymmetry in ankle function. Understanding gait and ankle movement variability in CAI may help identify the reasons for ankle movement asymmetry. Thus, this study aimed to assess ankle kinematics and temporospatial gait parameters in individuals with CAI. Twenty-five individuals with a history of CAI and 15 healthy controls were included in the study. Gait and ankle kinematics of preferred leg were analysed during walking at self-selected speed. The greatest difference in ankle kinematics was in dynamic equinus, which was increased in the CAI group. Greater ankle dorsiflexion and eversion movements, as well as hip abduction, occurred in the CAI group. These changes in the kinematics of the ankle joints during walking were related to self-reported ankle sprains and foot pronation. The results provide additional information for clinicians who work with people with ankle instability and highlight that the underlying gait abnormality seen in CAI is a dynamic one. The findings also explain why some individuals with CAI may report ankle instability-that is, greater eversion and dorsiflexion in the ankle joints.
