The role of PET in the management of lung carcinoma. The evidence from a number of recent studies has consistently demonstrated the superiority of (18)F-fluorodeoxyglucose PET in predicting survival in patients with advanced stage lung cancer. Metabolic imaging of lung cancer is complementary to anatomic imaging, especially in the assessment of chest wall, mediastinal lymph node, and pleural metastases. Recent studies have suggested that the use of PET in the postoperative assessment of patients with non-small cell lung cancer may have a prognostic impact. However, further studies are needed to establish whether PET will have a role in the assessment of the response of patients with lung cancer to systemic therapies and the prediction of outcomes. Discrete character of quantum Hall states, fractional excitation spectra, and wave functions in an artificial magnetic lattice. The topological nature of the quantum Hall effect is investigated in artificial quantum Hall bilayers with a perpendicular magnetic field using density-matrix calculations.

The discrete character of the ground states is shown for a suitable choice of the Hamiltonian. The filling factor dependence of both the excitation spectrum and the wave function of the lowest-Landau-level state is analyzed. The wave function and the spectrum are calculated for arbitrary magnetic fields and gauge-field strengths. The method is numerically exact for an incompressible ground state.

Climate change and polar amplification are the two biggest challenges confronting human civilisation this century. Put simply, our planet is changing, and it's changing fast. Polar regions, including the Arctic, are changing faster than anywhere else on Earth, and these changes are being caused in part by rising average temperatures, melting sea ice and higher atmospheric water vapour content. This rate of change is most striking in polar regions because it is quite difficult
